After 13 years of litigation, the Campaign for Fiscal Equity lawsuit is moving toward another legal decision by the New York State Court of Appeals, the state's highest court.

But the court decision is just one part of the larger policy questions about how this controversial case will play out in the areas of fiscal and education policy in New York City and New York State.

What will be done to ensure that the court's actions translate into improved student outcomes? Should additional funds be transferred to the city's education authorities with no questions asked or should the governor demand additional accountability measures? How will the promise of improved teaching be realized?

These are some of the issues that our four panelists will explore in what promises to be a lively and timely discussion.
